By ROBERT DIGITALE

Analy High officials in Sebastopol estimate they saved about $10,000 this year by letting parents turn to the school Web site for registration materials.

"We feel that it's really cost-effective," Principal Martin Webb said.

In past years the school printed and mailed packets to an estimated 1,400 students.

Nearly 1,000 students registered Thursday for the school year that begins Aug. 28. Ninety percent brought their own forms, Webb said.

Another registration is set for Tuesday morning. The school has forms and information packets available for those who don't print and fill out the paperwork at home.

The online feature gave parents the option of printing just the 11 required forms or the complete 48-page packet.

The online forms are part of a broader effort to make the school's Web site more valuable for parents and students.

For the past year, two tech-savvy parents, Jim Good-enough and Michael Fitzgibbon, have been helping improve the site: www.analy.org.

Besides the online registration forms, the site features regular newsletters, weekly bulletins and occasional video presentations by the principal.

In the future, parents might be able to update forms online, such as those listing who school officials should contact on behalf of students in case of emergency. Students eventually may be able to pay online for yearbooks and other school costs, Webb said.

Hey Aug 13 @ 5:13P. Next time you vote? Make sure you say Yes on all measures, bonds: anything which can financially benefit our schools. And tell your friends, and so on (instead of just plunking out something inane).

Casa should do this! We waste so much money each year printing registration stuff, half of which is Spanish only...so we end up throwing away most of the paper!

So now we as parents pay the cost as well as pay their salaries. We should be able to fill them out online and send them back online.
